Description of the research project: Many statistical systems can be modeled, at the mesoscale, in terms of a field that describes the fluctuations of a physical property in space and time. The dynamics of these fields can be studied by introducing a tracer particle, such as a colloid, which interacts with them. In fact, from the dynamics of the tracer, one can infer the properties of the field. In active systems, an additional challenge arises because the field-particle interactions violate detailed balance, as in the case of chemotactic particles. These produce a chemical species diffusing in the surrounding environment, but from which they might be repelled, making their dynamics non-equilibrium and non-Markovian. The project aims at studying the dynamics of both active and passive particles in contact with both active and passive fields, in order to characterize the resulting stochastic dynamics.
